(I)

Relation of Sociology with Psychology

Sociology and psychology are related because both study human behavior, but in different ways. Sociology focuses on society, social groups, and how people interact, while psychology studies individual thoughts, feelings, and behavior. Sociology looks at how things like culture, family, and social rules shape people, while psychology focuses on how the mind works and how people develop. Despite their differences, both help us understand human behavior. Social psychology connects both fields by studying how society influences individual actions. Together, sociology and psychology are useful in areas like education, healthcare, and crime prevention.

(II)

Significance of Socialization

Socialization is important because it helps individuals learn the norms, values, and behaviors needed to live in society. It shapes a person's personality, teaches social skills, and helps them understand their roles in different situations. Through socialization, cultural traditions and knowledge are passed from one generation to another, ensuring social continuity. It also helps people adapt to their environment, develop relationships, and become responsible members of society. Without socialization, individuals would struggle to communicate, follow rules, or function properly in social settings.

(III)

Illiteracy as a Social Problem

Illiteracy is a big problem because it leads to poverty and unemployment. It also causes slow economic growth and makes people unaware of their rights. Illiterate people may find it difficult to improve their lives and contribute to society.

(IV)

Dysfunctions and their Latent Functions

Dysfunctions are negative aspects of society that create instability, such as crime, unemployment, or corruption. However, they can have latent functions, which are unintended positive effects. For example, crime leads to the growth of law enforcement and security jobs, while protests can bring social and political reforms. This shows that even harmful aspects of society can sometimes result in unexpected benefits.

(V)

Media as an Agent of Socialization

Media plays a big role in teaching people about society. It influences opinions, spreads information, and shapes culture. Television, social media, and newspapers help people learn new ideas and behaviors. Despite its positive and negative effects, media remains one of the most influential agents of socialization in modern society, impacting how people think, behave, and interact with others.

(VI)

Mores and Folkways

Mores

Mores are strong social norms that are based on moral values and are essential for maintaining order in society. Breaking mores is often seen as serious and may lead to punishment. Example: Stealing, lying, or disrespecting elders is considered wrong in most cultures.

Folkways

Folkways are everyday social habits and customs that are not strictly enforced. They guide polite behavior but do not carry serious consequences if broken.

Example: Saying "thank you," dressing appropriately, or eating with manners.

Long Questions

QNO.01 Theory of Self Development by George Herbert Mead

SELF: Self refers to an individual's sense of identity, personality, and consciousness, shaped through social interactions and experiences. It is the way a person perceives themselves in relation to others and society. The concept of self evolves over time as a person interacts with their environment, culture, and social groups.

Theory of Self by George Herbert Mead

The concept of self is shaped through socialization in groups. According to Merrill, self develops through interactions in different group settings. People in our surroundings, such as family, friends, classmates, and neighbors, influence the formation of self. Among these, the most important group plays a significant role in shaping an individual's identity. These people, whose opinions and behaviors help shape one's self, form what is called the Reference Group.

The individual gradually begins to see society as a whole and understands its expectations. Mead refers to this as "taking the role of the generalized other." The generalized other consists of cultural norms, values, folkways, and morals that shape a person's behavior. As a child grows, they become aware of societal expectations and judge themselves accordingly. Merrill describes this as the "social self" or the "core of personality." Muhammad Fayyaz quotes Mead, stating that self is a dynamic system that evolves over time through social experiences.

Mead further explains that self is a product of social life and continues to develop through interactions. It adapts based on experiences, shaping emotions like love and hatred, which emerge through human observation and social relationships.

Stages of Self-Development by Mead

Mead outlines two key stages in the development of self:

1. First Stage – "I" (Subjective Self)

In this stage, the self is formed by the attitudes of others toward the individual and how they interact with one another.

The "I" represents personal identity, spontaneous reactions, and individuality.

2. Second Stage – "Me" (Social Self)

The self becomes structured by the attitudes of the generalized other or the social group.

At this stage, the individual starts seeing themselves through the lens of society's expectations and adjusts their behavior accordingly.

The "Me" represents the internalized norms, values, and rules of society.

QNO.02 Write a note on two following Cultural elements?

I) Belief

II) Symbol

I) Belief

According to John J. Macionis, beliefs are specific thoughts or ideas that people hold to be true.

Every sect within a culture has some beliefs for cultural refuge. These beliefs are responsible for the spiritual fulfillment of needs and wants. Muslims believe in God, Holy Prophet, the Day of Judgment, recitation of the Holy Quran, Hajj, etc. Sikhs wear a bangle in one hand, bear a long beard, and keep a dagger. Christians consider the cross sacred, while Hindus revere the water of Ganga and wear a necklace or a cotton thread around their necks.

II) Symbols

A symbol is anything that stands for something else. Culture is a system of symbols. Symbols are used to represent, express, and stand for an event or situation. They guide behavior and indicate past, present, or future events. For example, a heap of ash suggests something was burned, and a wet street shows it has rained.

Bowing the head, whistling, winking, and other gestures are also symbols that convey specific meanings. Bait-Ullah is a symbol of God for Muslims, and they pray towards it. Americans shake hands to say "Yes" and nod their heads to say "No." Other examples of symbols include flags, anthems, pictures, and statues, which serve as short expressions for identifying objects or situations.

QNO.03 Define Culture. Write a note on types of culture?

Culture: Culture is the way of life of a society, including its beliefs, values, customs, traditions, language, and material objects. It shapes how people think, behave, and interact with others. Culture is learned and passed down from one generation to another.

TYPES OF CULTURE

Real Culture

Real culture is the culture that can be observed in our social life. It includes the part of culture that people adopt in their daily lives. However, the entire culture is never completely real because some aspects remain unpracticed. For example, while many claim to follow Islam, they may not fully implement its teachings in their social life. The part of Islam that people actually follow represents their real culture.

Ideal Culture

Ideal culture is the cultural pattern or standard that a society aspires to but may not fully achieve. It serves as a societal goal and is often explained through books, speeches, and teachings. While people may claim to follow an ideal culture, their real culture is determined by what they actually practice. For example, Islam is an ideal culture for Muslims, but their real culture is reflected in how much of its teachings they practice. Although different, real and ideal cultures are interconnected.

Material Culture

According to John J. Macionis, "Material culture consists of the physical things created by members of a society, from armchairs to zippers."

Examples:

Material culture includes all human-made objects such as tools, furniture, vehicles, roads, buildings, and bridges. It also consists of technical and material equipment like printing presses, telephones, televisions, tractors, and machine guns. Additionally, institutions such as banks, parliaments, insurance systems, and currency systems are considered part of material culture, which is often associated with civilization.

Non-Material Culture

According to John J. Macionis, "Nonmaterial culture consists of ideas created by members of a society, ranging from art to Zen."

Examples:

non-material culture includes language, beliefs, values, customs, habits, rituals, and ceremonies. It also encompasses social attitudes, outlooks, and ways of thinking, feeling, and behaving. Unlike material culture, which consists of tangible objects, non-material culture represents the intangible aspects that shape a society's identity.
