(I)

Manifest and Latent Function

Manifest Functions

Manifest functions are the clear and expected results of an action or institution. These are the main goals that people can easily see and understand. For example, the manifest function of a school is to provide education and help students learn reading, writing, and math. It is the planned and direct purpose of the activity. People usually know about manifest functions because they are open and obvious. In short, manifest functions are the main reason something exists in society.

Latent Functions

Latent functions are the hidden and unintended results of an action or institution. These are not planned but still happen as a side effect. For example, a school also teaches students how to make friends, work in groups, and follow social rules — this is a latent function. People may not think about these results, but they are still very important. Latent functions are often discovered later and help in understanding the deeper impact of something. They show that even simple things can have more than one purpose in society.

(II)

Material and Non-Material Culture

Material Culture

Material culture includes all the physical objects made by people in a society. These can be things like clothes, houses, roads, vehicles, machines, tools, and furniture. These objects are tangible, which means we can see and touch them. Material culture shows the technological level and lifestyle of a society. For example, mobile phones, TVs, and cars are all part of modern material culture. It helps us understand how people live, work, and solve problems in daily life.

Non-Material Culture

Non-material culture includes all the things that are not physical but are important to society. This includes beliefs, values, customs, language, religion, and morals. These things cannot be touched, but they guide how people think and behave. Non-material culture helps people know what is right or wrong, and how to live with others. For example, respecting elders, speaking the truth, and religious rituals are part of non-material culture. It plays a big role in building the identity and unity of a society.

(III)

School as an Agent of Socialization

School plays a very important role in the socialization of children. It teaches students how to follow rules, respect others, and behave properly in society. In school, children learn how to communicate, work in groups, and solve problems together. Teachers help students understand values like honesty, discipline, and responsibility. Through daily routines and classroom rules, students get used to structure and order. School also helps children learn about different cultures, traditions, and national identity. It prepares them to become active and responsible members of society. Overall, school shapes a child's behavior, personality, and future life.

(IV)

Relation of Sociology with Psychology

Sociology and psychology are related because both study human behavior, but in different ways. Sociology focuses on society, social groups, and how people interact, while psychology studies individual thoughts, feelings, and behavior. Sociology looks at how things like culture, family, and social rules shape people, while psychology focuses on how the mind works and how people develop. Despite their differences, both help us understand human behavior. Social psychology connects both fields by studying how society influences individual actions. Together, sociology and psychology are useful in areas like education, healthcare, and crime prevention.

(V)

Significance of Socialization

Socialization is important because it helps individuals learn the norms, values, and behaviors needed to live in society. It shapes a person's personality, teaches social skills, and helps them understand their roles in different situations. Through socialization, cultural traditions and knowledge are passed from one generation to another, ensuring social continuity. It also helps people adapt to their environment, develop relationships, and become responsible members of society. Without socialization, individuals would struggle to communicate, follow rules, or function properly in social settings.

(VI)

Illiteracy as a Social Problem

Illiteracy is a big problem because it leads to poverty and unemployment. It also causes slow economic growth and makes people unaware of their rights. Illiterate people may find it difficult to improve their lives and contribute to society.

Long Questions

QNO.01 Theory of Self Development by George Herbert Mead

SELF: Self refers to an individual's sense of identity, personality, and consciousness, shaped through social interactions and experiences. It is the way a person perceives themselves in relation to others and society. The concept of self evolves over time as a person interacts with their environment, culture, and social groups.

Theory of Self by George Herbert Mead

The concept of self is shaped through socialization in groups. According to Merrill, self develops through interactions in different group settings. People in our surroundings, such as family, friends, classmates, and neighbors, influence the formation of self. Among these, the most important group plays a significant role in shaping an individual's identity. These people, whose opinions and behaviors help shape one's self, form what is called the Reference Group.

The individual gradually begins to see society as a whole and understands its expectations. Mead refers to this as "taking the role of the generalized other." The generalized other consists of cultural norms, values, folkways, and morals that shape a person's behavior. As a child grows, they become aware of societal expectations and judge themselves accordingly. Merrill describes this as the "social self" or the "core of personality." Muhammad Fayyaz quotes Mead, stating that self is a dynamic system that evolves over time through social experiences.

Mead further explains that self is a product of social life and continues to develop through interactions. It adapts based on experiences, shaping emotions like love and hatred, which emerge through human observation and social relationships.

Stages of Self-Development by Mead

Mead outlines two key stages in the development of self:

1. First Stage – "I" (Subjective Self)

In this stage, the self is formed by the attitudes of others toward the individual and how they interact with one another.

The "I" represents personal identity, spontaneous reactions, and individuality.

2. Second Stage – "Me" (Social Self)

The self becomes structured by the attitudes of the generalized other or the social group.

At this stage, the individual starts seeing themselves through the lens of society's expectations and adjusts their behavior accordingly.

The "Me" represents the internalized norms, values, and rules of society.

QNO.02 Write a note on two following Cultural elements?

I) Norm

1. Norms

Norms are the rules and expectations that guide how people should behave in a society. They tell us what is considered right or wrong, good or bad, and acceptable or unacceptable. For example, saying "thank you", waiting in line, and respecting elders are all social norms. These rules help people live together peacefully and maintain order in society. If someone breaks a norm, they may face disapproval or punishment. Norms are learned from family, school, religion, and media.

2. Technology

Technology means the use of tools, machines, and knowledge to solve problems or make life easier. It is a part of material culture because it includes physical things like mobiles, computers, cars, and internet systems.

II) Technology

Technology plays a big role in areas like communication, education, medicine, and transport. It shows how advanced a society is and helps improve the standard of living. Every generation creates new technology to meet its needs. Today, technology is deeply connected to daily life and social change.

Q.3 – Define Crime and write types of crime

Definition of Crime:

Crime is any act that goes against the laws of a country and is considered harmful to society. It includes activities that are illegal and punishable by the government. People who commit crimes are often arrested and punished through fines, jail, or other legal actions. Crime causes fear, insecurity, and disorder in society. Controlling crime is important for creating a peaceful and safe environment for all citizens. Every society has its own rules and laws, and anything that breaks those laws is called a crime.

Types of Crime:

1. Personal Crimes

Personal crimes are those that directly harm a person. These include murder, rape, assault, and kidnapping. The victim is physically or emotionally hurt. These crimes create fear and insecurity in society. They are taken very seriously by the law and often lead to strong punishments.

2. Property Crimes

Property crimes involve stealing or damaging someone's property. Examples are theft, burglary, robbery, and arson (setting fire). These crimes do not always harm a person directly but cause financial loss. They are common in both cities and rural areas. Police try to prevent these crimes by using security systems and patrols.

3. White-Collar Crimes

White-collar crimes are committed by educated people in offices or businesses. Examples include fraud, bribery, embezzlement, and corruption. These crimes usually involve money or documents, not violence. They can cause huge financial damage to companies or the public. These crimes are often hidden and difficult to detect.

4. Organized Crimes

Organized crimes are done by groups or gangs that plan and control criminal activities. Examples include drug trafficking, human smuggling, illegal weapons, and black money. These groups work secretly and sometimes use violence and fear. They earn a lot of money through illegal businesses. Governments use special police forces to fight such crimes.

5. Victimless Crimes

Victimless crimes are acts that do not directly harm another person, but are still illegal. Examples are gambling, drug use, and illegal drinking. In these crimes, no one is directly attacked or robbed, but society may still be affected. Some people believe these should not be crimes, but laws still forbid them in many places. These crimes can lead to addiction and social problems.

6. Corporate Crimes

Corporate crimes are crimes committed by companies or business organizations. These include cheating customers, polluting the environment, and breaking labor laws. The goal is to make more profit, even if people or nature are harmed. These crimes often go unnoticed for a long time. Governments have special rules to punish such companies.

7. Professional Crimes

Professional crimes are committed by people who regularly do illegal work as their job. Examples include professional thieves, forgers, or hackers. These people know how to avoid the police and continue their crimes. They do this for money or power. Such criminals are often experienced and trained in illegal activities.

8. Casual Crimes

Casual crimes are small crimes done without much planning. Examples include shoplifting, fighting in public, or breaking traffic rules. These crimes may not seem serious but can cause disturbance in society. They are often done by people without thinking about the law. Police may give warnings, fines, or short-term punishment for such acts.
