(I)

Relationship b/w Sociology and political Science

Sociology and political science are closely related because both study human behavior in groups. Sociology focuses on how people live in society, while political science focuses on government, power, and political systems. Both subjects help us understand how rules, laws, and leadership affect people. Sociology provides background for understanding political actions, while political science explains how social ideas are made into laws. Together, they help explain how society and politics work together.

(II)

Social Problem and Examples

A social problem is an issue that negatively affects people in a society and needs a solution. These problems disturb peace, fairness, and development. Examples of social problems include poverty, illiteracy, unemployment, crime, and drug addiction. These problems often spread and cause suffering in families and communities. Social problems need attention from the government, NGOs, and society to be solved.

(III)

Concept of “SELF” given by C.H. Cooley

C.H. Cooley introduced the concept of the "Looking Glass Self". He said that a person's self-image is formed by how they think others see them. We imagine how we appear to others, then how they judge us, and finally, we feel pride or shame based on that. According to Cooley, the self is not born with us, but is built through social interaction. The idea shows that society plays a big role in shaping a person's identity.

(IV)

Role Conflict and Role Strain.

Role conflict

Role Conflict happens when a person has two or more roles that clash. For example, a person may be a student and a worker, and both roles demand attention at the same time. This causes stress and confusion.

Role Strain:

Role strain happens when there is pressure within a single role. For example, a teacher may feel stress managing teaching, checking papers, and student behavior. In role strain, the conflict is within one role only.

Long Questions

QNO.03

(A) Define Culture? Also explain the agents of Socialization.

Culture :

Culture is the way people live in a society. It includes their language, dress, food, beliefs, customs, and values. Culture helps people understand how to behave and think in different situations. It is learned from others and passed from one generation to the next.

Agents of Socialization

Socialization means learning how to live, behave, and interact in society. Different groups and institutions help a person learn values, rules, and culture — these are called agents of socialization. Below are the main agents:

1. Family

Family is the first and most important agent of socialization. It teaches a child how to talk, behave, respect elders, and follow traditions. Children learn religion, language, customs, and love from parents and siblings. The family also teaches what is right or wrong through daily actions and guidance. A strong family builds a child's personality, values, and habits.

2. Peer Group or Age Mates

Peer group means friends of the same age group. They play a big role, especially during school and teenage years. From peers, children learn how to share, play, cooperate, and sometimes even face peer pressure. They also learn how to adjust with others and build confidence. Peer groups help in developing social skills, hobbies, and group behavior.

3. Social Institutions (School, Religion, etc.)

Social institutions like schools, religious centers, and clubs also help in socialization. Schools teach discipline, rules, teamwork, and knowledge. Religion teaches moral values, like being honest, kind, and respectful. These institutions help people understand their duties and rights in society. They also shape a person's character and behavior.

4. Literature and Mass Media

Literature includes books, newspapers, and stories, while mass media includes TV, radio, internet, and social media. These sources teach people about current events, social issues, role models, and different cultures. They influence our thinking, fashion, language, and even our dreams. Media can have both positive and negative effects on people, especially youth. It is now one of the strongest agents of socialization.

5. Community

Community means the neighborhood or area where a person lives. It includes neighbors, local leaders, and common people. The community teaches how to live peacefully, help others, and respect local rules. Festivals, gatherings, and local events also help people connect and share cultural values. A good community helps in building trust, safety, and cooperation among people.

QNO.03

(B) What is Bureaucracy? Also discuss the characteristics of Bureaucracy.

Bureaucracy:

Bureaucracy is a system used to run offices, governments, and large organizations in an organized way. It follows fixed rules and structure to make sure everything works smoothly. The concept of bureaucracy was explained by Max Weber, a famous sociologist. He said that bureaucracy helps in maintaining order, discipline, and fairness in institutions.

Some important characteristics of bureaucracy are:

1. Jurisdictional Competency

This means that every person or office in a bureaucracy has a specific area of responsibility. Work is divided clearly so that everyone knows what they have to do. There is no overlap in duties, which avoids confusion. It helps in improving efficiency and accountability.

2. Specific Functions

Each employee has a clear and fixed duty or job role. They are not asked to do work that is outside their role. This makes it easier to train them and improves their performance. Specific functions also help in managing time and resources properly.

3. Norms and Codes

Norms and codes are the moral values and rules that employees are expected to follow. They guide the behavior of workers and make sure they act in a professional and respectful way. These may include honesty, punctuality, and teamwork. Norms help in creating a disciplined work culture.

4. Authority

In bureaucracy, every position has some level of power or authority. This authority is used to make decisions, give orders, and get work done. Higher officers have more authority, while lower ones follow instructions. It ensures a proper working system and control.

5. Rationality

Rationality means that decisions are made based on logic, facts, and rules, not emotions. Work is done in a planned and reasonable way. It avoids personal opinions and supports fair treatment for all. Rational thinking improves efficiency and justice.

6. Relative Permanence

Jobs in a bureaucracy are usually long-term and stable. Employees are not changed frequently without reason. This gives workers a sense of security and allows them to gain experience over time. It helps the organization work smoothly and continuously.

7. Specialization

Every worker in a bureaucracy is trained in a specific skill or task. They become experts in their work, which increases quality and speed. Specialization avoids errors and confusion. It helps each department run more professionally.

8. Hierarchy of Position

A clear chain of command exists, meaning there are different levels of positions. Higher levels supervise and guide lower levels. This structure helps in decision-making, control, and proper flow of information. It also ensures discipline in the system.

9. Rules and Regulations

All work is done by following official rules and laws. These rules are made to ensure fairness, equality, and order. No one is above the rules — not even the top officer. Rules help in reducing conflicts and confusion.

10. Technical Competence

People are selected and promoted based on their knowledge, skills, and qualifications. This ensures that only capable and trained individuals do the job. Technical competence leads to better results and fewer mistakes. It also motivates others to work hard and improve.

11. Impersonality

Decisions are made without personal feelings or favoritism. Everyone is treated equally, whether rich or poor. This keeps the system neutral and fair. Impersonality helps in building trust in the organization.

12. Formal Written Communication

All official communication is done in written form like emails, letters, or reports. This helps in keeping records and avoids misunderstandings. Written communication can be used as proof in the future. It makes the work process more organized and clearer.
